

Some people believe that university education should be provided free of charge, while others argue that students should pay tuition fees. Although free education can improve access to higher studies, I believe that students should contribute towards the cost of their education.

On the one hand, making university education free would give students from low-income families a better opportunity to attend university. Many talented students are unable to pursue higher education because tuition fees can place a heavy financial burden on their families. Free education could therefore create greater equality and allow more young people to develop professional skills. It could also benefit society by producing a larger number of qualified workers.

On the other hand, universities require substantial funding to pay teachers, maintain facilities and provide modern learning resources. If students contribute through tuition fees, institutions can generate additional revenue and potentially offer better-quality education. Moreover, graduates generally have greater employment opportunities and higher earning potential than people without university qualifications. It is therefore reasonable for them to share some of the financial responsibility for their education.

In my opinion, university education should not be completely free for everyone. Instead, governments should provide scholarships, grants and reduced fees to students from disadvantaged backgrounds. This approach would maintain access to higher education while ensuring that universities have sufficient funding to maintain educational standards.

Overall, students should make a reasonable financial contribution, but governments should ensure that tuition costs do not prevent capable students from attending university.