

Some people argue that public libraries are no longer necessary because information is readily available online, while others believe that libraries remain important. Although the internet has changed how people access information, I believe public libraries continue to serve an important purpose.

Those who consider libraries unnecessary point to the enormous amount of information available online. People can access digital books, academic resources, news and educational materials from their homes using smartphones or computers. Online resources are often faster and more convenient than visiting a physical library. In addition, many modern services provide digital versions of books, reducing the need for traditional collections.

However, libraries offer benefits that cannot be completely replaced by the internet. They provide free access to books, computers and study spaces for people who may not have these resources at home. This is particularly important for students and low-income families. Libraries also provide a quiet environment where people can study without the distractions commonly found at home.

Furthermore, librarians can help users identify reliable sources and find appropriate information. This is increasingly valuable because the internet contains a large amount of inaccurate or misleading content. Libraries also organise educational activities, reading programmes and community events that encourage learning and social interaction.

In my opinion, public libraries should adapt rather than disappear. They can combine traditional book collections with digital resources, computer facilities and educational services to remain relevant in the modern world.

In conclusion, although the internet has made information more accessible, public libraries continue to provide valuable educational, social and technological resources. Therefore, they remain necessary in modern communities.
